A PITIABLE SIGHT-DRUNKEN WOMENelegant resi- formally introduced by our friend Charles Upon the long docket of the Police Court white and black, who were up to answer for various offences, was the name of Obedience Bray, a young white woman, who had evidently seen better days, poorly and thinly clad, wearing a round straw hat, upon which was a tattered veil that covered only the upper portion of her face. The woman was an old offender, who had recently been discharged from jail, but who could not resist the temptation of drink, and had returned again to her former bad habits. "Come out here, Obedience Bray," called Captain Chalkley, when her name was reached on the docket. The woman got up from the bench upon which she was sitting in the prisoner's box, and walked up to the bar. "Drunk, I suppose," said the Justice, as the woman appeared before him, her head bung down, her face covered with a veil, and presenting altogether a most pitiable

"Drunk and disorderly, sir," replied the officer who, made the arrest. "She behaved very badly, sir; resisted the police; refused to go to the station-house, and finally when we got her there had to shut the windows and doors to keep the neighbors from hearing her noise." "How long have you been drinking this time?" inquired the Police Justice. She made some response, but in such a low tone of voice that it could not be heard. The woman now began to tremble and shake from head to foot. It was apparent that she was in a bad way. "Are you doing that on purpose, or are you nervous?" inquired Justice White. "I am nervous, sir," replied the woman; 'I can't help it."

The Justice sent an officer for a small quantity of whiskey, which was given her to drink-the Court fearing the woman The conditions on which the money is might have a fit and necessitate his sending

The next case of female drunkenness was that of Jennie Ruby, who created a disturbance in "Locust Place," and had to be locked up.

She came up to the Justice well-dressed and looking unlike a woman who is an habitual drinker. The usual dialogue followed-"not drunk since the last time," she said, and making promises for the future A fine of $5 was put down against her but she was unable to raise that much. Her pile of $2.50, however, was deposited in the Sergeant's cash-drawer. She thanked the Justice and left the court.

A WAITER CASE IN THE POLICE COURT. A young negro man named Robert Jackson was up before the Police Court on Saturday, charged with being a common thief and vagrant, and also with stealing a silver waiter. Rose, the junk-dealer, was also up; charged with buying the waiter, knowing it to have been stolen. A number of witnesses were examined, and the case prolonged. The charge of being a common thief was not made out. It was proven however, that the waiter was stolen between 3 and 4 o'clock in the afternoon; that it was brought by Jackson to Rose, who paid fifty cents for it. Captain Epps subsequently recovered the waiter from Rose and arrested him. The evidence against Rose was that when Captain Epps recovered the waiter Rose turned pale, looked scared, true of both classes in those walks of life said to be weakening daily.—Farmville give it to you."
